Profile

Emerging and established companies need strategies that identify, protect and preserve their intellectual property. David develops and implements these strategies to help clients keep their competitive edge.

Trademark opposition proceedings form a core component of a business's intellectual property strategy, and pending amendments to federal legislation may increase the frequency and complexity of these proceedings. David sifts through legal jargon and procedural complexity to present straightforward advice and recommendations to clients throughout the opposition process.

David's experience also includes litigation in the fields of technology and intellectual property. David has represented clients at the Ontario Superior Court and Federal Court. He effectively represents clients' interests at trial, through settlements, and at other stages of litigation, and does so within the scope of larger business strategies and priorities. David adopts a similar approach to oppositions in order to achieve optimal outcomes for clients - both applicants and opponents alike.
